Chapter 23

The Challenges Facing Distance Education in Southern Africa

Stanley Mpofo

Introduction

Distance education has hit the developing nations with a vengeance. The advent of political independence in Africa has been associated with greater educational opportunities for the majority of the people: people who were denied these opportunities before. There is tremendous pressure on governments to provide education to all who want it. However, there is not enough room in educational institutions to accommodate all who clamor for educational opportunities. Distance education is seen as the means to accommodate the ever-increasing demand for education. The last ten years has witnessed a rush for distance education by most African societies. However, in most cases the rush for distance education has been headlong. Large numbers of students have been enrolled before the procurement of the necessary resources.

This chapter examines the challenges facing the provision of distance education in selected African institutions and the implications thereof.

The Inevitable Push Toward Quantity of Education and Not Quality of Education

Education is considered a very valuable commodity in Africa. One of the major reasons for the rise of African nationalism that led to the many liberation wars was that colonial education systems favored the European minority. In many cases the African took up arms in an attempt to correct that injustice.

Political independence in Africa became synonymous with education. Politicians from all corners promised more and more education. No politician would live to see a single day in office if he/she did not promise more educational facilities - particularly schools for children. Suddenly each and every child was at school, something that was simply not possible before independence.

Unfortunately, the opening of the flood gates has been, to a large extent, the reason for the downfall of the education system in a number of African countries. Standards have been compromised in the name of quantity. The necessary resources, both human and material, have been in short supply. The pre-independence educational systems were not ready for the overnight influx of students. Although the Ministry of Education in most African nations receives a larger portion of the budget than any other Ministry, the amount still falls short of what is required to run a viable educational system. There was very little planning prior to the opening up of education to all and sundry.
